'EKAA: THE ONE' SHOWCASES RARE 64 YOGINI ARTWORKS IN HYDERABAD

Hyderabad | March 26, 2026: A unique and culturally significant art exhibition, "Ekaa: The One - The 64 Yogini Trail," by Dr. Beena Unnikrishnan, is being held in Hyderabad from March 26 to 28 at Gallery 78, Silpa Hills, Khanamet near HITEX.The exhibition presents a rare collection of all 64 Yogini artworks, offering an immersive experience rooted in the philosophy of Shakti—the primordial feminine energy. Through a contemporary artistic lens, the works explore themes of feminine power, balance, consciousness, and transformation.

Developed over five years, the collection is being showcased as a cohesive body of work by a single artist for the first time globally, marking a significant cultural milestone. Unlike traditional depictions, the exhibition reinterprets the Yogini tradition within modern social and cultural contexts.

Conceived as a non-commercial public initiative, the exhibition is open to all, with artworks not available for sale, emphasizing cultural dialogue over commerce. The showcase is part of a nationwide tour spanning 16 states over 81 days, covering more than 10,000 kilometres, and aims to build a pan-India narrative around India's sacred feminine heritage.

Inspired by ancient Yogini temples dating back to the 9th–12th centuries, the artworks symbolize various aspects such as intuition, courage, healing, and renewal. A distinctive feature of the artist's process is beginning each painting with the eyes, creating a deep emotional connection in every piece.

Sandeshkhali, RG Kar: Is BJP Trying To Revive The 2 Issues In Bengal?

Sandeshkhali, a remote stretch in the Sundarbans region of North 24 Parganas, lies far from Kolkata, not only geographically but also culturally. It is a region marked by poverty, weak infrastructure, and chronic underdevelopment. Yet, in recent years, particularly during the last election cycle, Sandeshkhali has emerged as a politically sensitive flashpoint in West Bengal. The controversy began with allegations against a local Trinamool Congress strong-man, Sheikh Shahjahan, accused of running illegal operations and perpetrating serious atrocities against women. Reports of the degrading treatment of poor local women triggered widespread outrage. Following sustained protests, Shahjahan was arrested and remains in custody. Among those who led the resistance was Rekha Patra, who emerged as a prominent face of the movement against the ruling party government. Despite the intensity of the protests, however, the issue failed to significantly alter the electoral outcome. The Trinamool Congress retained control of the area. While Sandeshkhali represented a rural flashpoint, a separate controversy in urban Kolkata drew national attention. The alleged rape case in the RG Kar area became a major political issue. Although the accused was arrested, the BJP continued to campaign on the claim that justice remained incomplete and that the real culprits had not been fully brought to account. The case sparked protests, candlelight marches, and broader civil society mobilisation. In the 2026 election campaign, the BJP is attempting to stitch these two episodes together - from rural Sandeshkhali to urban Kolkata - into a single political narrative. The strategy is clear: to revive both controversies as emblematic of a larger question of governance and women's safety in West Bengal. The unanswered question is whether this effort will translate into electoral gains. The BJP has returned to Sandeshkhali with renewed vigour. Rekha Patra has shifted her political activity to Hingalganj, an adjacent constituency, signalling an attempt to expand the issue's geographic resonance. The party hopes that allegations of atrocities in Sandeshkhali will influence voters beyond the immediate locality. This strategy draws on the deeper structural realities of the region. Sandeshkhali remains vulnerable to flooding, suffers from poor connectivity, and lacks adequate healthcare and educational facilities. Its economy is largely agrarian, with betel leaf cultivation playing a central role, and poverty continues to shape everyday life. These conditions provide fertile ground for political mobilisation. At the same time, the region's history offers a longer lens. The undivided 24 Parganas has long witnessed cycles of agrarian distress and local tensions. Colonial-era records describe administrators mediating communal disputes, while writers such as Bankim Chandra Chattopadhyay chronicled the hardships of Bengal's peasantry. Contemporary unrest, therefore, is not an aberration but part of a deeper historical continuum. Yet history alone does not win elections. In the previous contest, Sandeshkhali did not produce a decisive political shift. This time, however, the BJP appears determined to refine its campaign. Alongside Sandeshkhali, the focus has sharpened on the R.G. Kar case. The hospital falls within the Kashipur-Belgachia Assembly constituency, where Trinamool leader Atin Ghosh-seen as relatively popular and non-controversial-is contesting. But the political resonance of the case extends far beyond constituency boundaries. The victim's mother has also publicly expressed her desire to enter electoral politics, even appealing to the BJP for support in her pursuit of justice. This has reportedly caused friction within the CPI(M), whose leaders had been among the most vocal supporters of the family during the protests. Whether the BJP will offer her a nomination remains uncertain. Irrespective of that decision, the party is actively campaigning on both issues. Women have taken the lead in this effort, supported by high-profile visits from leaders such as Smriti Irani at the national level, and Rupa Ganguly and Agnimitra Paul within the state.

Is The Dreaded 'Dahiya Doctrine' Guiding Israeli Actions In Iran, Gaza, Lebanon?

Close your eyes for a moment and imagine this: millions of people in South Delhi are told to leave their homes overnight and move across the Yamuna to East Delhi. The warning is stark. Stay, and your life is at risk. But even the escape is dangerous. The bridges you must cross could be bombed at any moment. It sounds unthinkable in the calm, peaceful bubble of South Delhi, doesn't it?

And yet, this is exactly what has been unfolding in Lebanon. More than a million people fled southern Lebanon as Israeli strikes intensified. Entire communities are being uprooted, families carrying what little they can, uncertain not just of where they are going, but whether they will get there safely. A few days ago, that danger was captured in a moment that felt almost like a scene from a Hollywood war movie in its suddenness. British journalist Steven Sweeney, reporting for the Russian outlet RT, was covering the mass exodus while standing on a bridge over a river. In a dramatic 17-second video clip, a missile strikes the bridge. The screen shakes violently. For a brief, chilling moment, neither the reporter nor his cameraman is visible, leaving viewers fearing the worst. They survived, miraculously, with minor injuries. But the aftermath has sparked fresh controversy. Sweeney, who was clearly identifiable in a flak jacket marked "Press", has accused Israel of deliberately targeting him. He says he was documenting what he described as the "forced displacement of one million people" when the strike occurred. Israel has said civilians were warned, but Sweeney disputes this, alleging that the attack was an attempt to silence journalists reporting from the ground. The Russian government has also claimed it was a deliberate targeting of Russian TV journalists.

War Spilling Into Civilian Life
Theatres of war are generally seen on frontlines and in trenches. But not in Lebanon. Not in Iran. And, to be honest, not even in Israel. As Israel's fury with Hezbollah in Lebanon and its war with Iran intensify, and as both its adversaries respond with missiles fired into Israel, the battle lines are expanding into civilian life and destroying it. Across Iran, for example, the scale is striking. Housing complexes, medical facilities, schools, shops, and even heritage sites, have been hit. According to the Iranian Red Crescent, more than 67,000 civilian sites were struck, including 498 schools and 236 health facilities, until 18 March. Lebanon's misery appears equally bad, if not worse. In the midst of this widening destruction, a difficult question comes to mind: Is there a method behind this madness? Why do civilian areas and infrastructure repeatedly become part of the battlefield? Is this incidental or strategic? Those who have covered the Israeli-Palestinian bloody conflicts for years know what it is. They call it Israel's dreaded Dahiya doctrine'.

What Is the Dahiya Doctrine?
It is certainly, as far as we know, not a formally written policy, but a widely discussed Israeli military approach. At its core is the idea of using overwhelming, often disproportionate force, including against infrastructure, in areas where hostile groups operate. It takes its name from the Dahiya suburb of Beirut, heavily bombed during the 2006 war with Hezbollah, the Iran-backed militia group. The destruction there became a reference point for future military thinking. Former Israeli general Gadi Eisenkot later articulated the logic clearly: in future conflicts, areas from which Israel is attacked would face intense destruction. The aim was deterrence - making the cost of conflict so high that it discourages future attacks. In simple terms: hit hard enough that the message cannot be ignored.

Why Israel Uses It
From Israel's perspective, this approach is shaped by the nature of its adversaries. Groups like Hezbollah and Hamas are often accused by Israel of operating within civilian areas, blending into urban environments. Israeli officials argue that the battlefield is embedded within civilian spaces. They say that a clear separation between military and civilian targets is often impossible. They also claim that strong, decisive force is needed to avoid prolonged conflict. It is said that the strategy is built around three goals: deterrence, speed and pressure. Deterrence sends a message across the region. Speed aims to shorten wars. Pressure, more controversially, seeks to raise the cost of conflict for the environment in which armed groups operate. Civilian casualties, which often run into thousands, are just collateral damage and can't be helped.

The Legal and Moral Fault Line
For obvious reasons, this approach has been widely criticised. International humanitarian law is based on two key principles: distinction and proportionality. Civilians and civilian objects must be protected. Even when attacking military targets, civilian harm must not be excessive. Human rights bodies argue that the scale of destruction and deaths witnessed in places like Gaza, Lebanon, and now Iran, raises serious concerns. Israel, however, rejects the accusation that it deliberately targets civilians as a way of collective punishment. Its position rests on three main points: It acts in self-defence. The Gaza operations by Israel began as a result of the brutal Hamas attack inside Israel, killing over 1200 people.

Cuba And The End Of An Era

Cuba's deepening crisis represents more than the failure of an economic model-it signals a turning point in Global South politics. While attention remains fixed on the Middle East, consequential shifts are unfolding across Latin America, shaped in significant part by a more assertive U.S. policy posture that has intensified long-standing pressures on the region. The island is facing a severe economic and energy crisis, driven by structural weaknesses and the cumulative weight of external constraints. Decades of U.S. economic embargoes-tightened in recent years-have pushed an already fragile system toward breaking point. Fuel shortages, power outages, and rising social strain reveal a system under acute stress, reflecting a wider shift in hemispheric dynamics. Cuba, long seen as an emblem of resistance to Western dominance, now confronts the practical limits of that posture.

For decades, countries such as Cuba, Venezuela, and Bolivia were romanticized across the Global South as symbols of sovereignty and defiance. Figures like Fidel Castro, Che Guevara, and Hugo Chávez occupied an outsized place in this imagination. Yet ideology and symbolism often obscured more complex realities. Cuba became a Soviet outpost during the Cold War, culminating in the Cuban Missile Crisis-the closest the world came to nuclear confrontation in that era. Economically, Cuba and Venezuela might have achieved more sustained development had they pursued more pragmatic engagement with the United States, as many in the region did. Today, that question is no longer theoretical. The collapse of Venezuelan support, particularly in the energy sector, combined with sustained U.S. pressure, has left Cuba increasingly isolated. Early signs suggest Havana may now explore limited accommodation with Washington. Even tentative steps would mark a profound departure from decades of entrenched positioning. If this trajectory continues, it may signal the decline of an older form of Global South politics-once anchored in ideological defiance, now yielding to the imperatives of realism. The Non-Aligned Movement and the Group of 77, once central to the moral and rhetorical architecture of the post-colonial world, are likely to see their influence further diluted in this evolving environment. An earlier era of ideological posturing is giving way to more pragmatic navigation of power and opportunity. Yet realism does not eliminate the need for dignity. States must recognize their limitations, but major powers must also understand that humiliation can seed future instability. The experiences of Iraq, Afghanistan, and Libya illustrate how coercive or poorly managed transitions often create new crises. Similarly, the post-Cold War order-widely perceived in Moscow as dismissive of its security and status-helped shape grievances that continue to influence global geopolitics. An instructive counterpoint is the evolution of relations between the United States and Vietnam. Despite a deeply traumatic war, the two countries today engage as pragmatic partners. This transformation underscores that even the most adversarial histories can give way to stable and mutually beneficial relationships-provided transitions are managed with foresight and respect. How transitions are managed can be as important as the transitions themselves. Amid this evolving landscape, India has a distinct opportunity. It is one of the few countries with credibility across the Global South and sustained engagement with the United States. This positions it to act as a bridge-engaging countries like Cuba while supporting gradual, dignified economic and political adjustment. India's own experience-balancing strategic autonomy with pragmatic partnerships-offers a relevant template. Platforms such as the Non-Aligned Movement and BRICS will need to adapt, or be complemented by more flexible coalitions aligned with contemporary realities. Diasporas also shape outcomes. In the United States, Cuban, Venezuelan, and Iranian communities influence domestic debates and, at times, foreign policy. India, too, must navigate the growing influence of its diaspora in key Western capitals-an asset if managed carefully, but a potential complication if not. The manner of transition remains critical. Cuba and Venezuela must adapt with legitimacy intact. An emerging order perceived as purely coercive or dismissive will generate resistance, undermining both regional stability and broader strategic objectives. Successful transitions require early, careful engagement, guided by respect and strategic foresight. The stakes are significant. Cuba, Venezuela, and others remain symbols of a historical narrative, but the world is moving toward a multipolar order shaped by realism, strategy, and negotiated respect. India has both the credibility and the opportunity to help guide this transition-toward a Global South that is pragmatic, resilient, and capable of asserting itself without confrontation. The Global South is not disappearing; it is being redefined. The question is whether India and its partners will move early enough to shape that process-ensuring the emerging order reflects inclusion, pragmatism, and respect, rather than humiliation.

Not China, Not Russia: Why Is Pak Suddenly Everywhere In US-Iran 'Talks'?

It seems nothing can stop Pakistan's power play even as it battles Afghanistan and multiple internal crises. The news that Washington routed the 'peace' deal via Islamabad has most Pakistanis themselves puzzled, and not a little apprehensive. After all, the ebullient Trump may change his mind at any minute, and trifling with Iran, or even reaching out to it, is fraught with danger. But what is clear is that Pakistan is certainly reaching out, and that too publicly. If this succeeds, the key actors will claim a victory in the region and in the Muslim world. In fact, it may be anything but. That's the stuff of details.

Too Many People Talking
First, the facts as reported. The Financial Times reported that Field Marshal Asim Munir had reached out to Trump proposing Pakistan as the "venue" for talks. This was on March 23, at about the same time that Trump announced the 'five-day' pause. These two events may not be directly connected, since a number of countries, including Turkey, Egypt, not to mention Russia, have been pressing Washington to end the war. However, none is very keen to get directly involved. Turkey, for instance, has its own Shia population that might get restive if talks are held on its territory. In short, Pakistan may well be the fall guy. At the same time, Pakistan Prime Minister Shahbaz Sharif was talking to Iranian President Masoud Pezeshkian. Not surprisingly, the Chinese also reached out to persuade Iran to pitch for peace. On March 25, the Prime Minister was briefing the Saudis, while Pakistan's Foreign Minister, Ishaq Dar, was talking again to his counterparts in Turkey, also reaching out to Iraq recently in an effort to get the Ummah united to end the war. That's a lot of people talking almost at the same time. The big takeaway for the political leadership was, however, that President Trump 'reposted' Shehbaz Sharif's tweet welcoming and supporting 'ongoing' efforts to end the war. That was when Tehran denied that there was anything at all in the pipeline. But Pakistan has much to gain from peace in the region.

Riyadh Compliance Demands
First, there is that troublesome Saudi-Pakistan 'Strategic Mutual Defence Agreement', signed in September last year, which specifically promised that Pakistan would stand by Riyadh if it was attacked. Though labelled 'Mutual', Saudis are hardly capable of standing by Pakistan in a war; but they could certainly provide the money, which made the whole deal attractive to Pakistan - which, in any case, was already providing training and even manning much of the Saudi Armed Forces, besides getting access to the best of US weapons that money could (literally) buy. But with the first drone attacks - either intended or mistaken - that hit the kingdom, the Saudis summoned the Field Marshal, with Defence Minister Prince Khalid posting pointedly that the two had discussed the attacks "and the measures needed to halt them within the framework of our Joint Strategic Defence Agreement". The Field Marshal would have quailed at the thought of standing against a neighbouring Shia power - and Iran is a power, make no mistake. But it seems Munir would have had its answer ready. On March 1, thousands of Shia youth went on a rampage in Karachi, even entering American embassy premises, with this continuing at other locations till the next day. For a country that has been able to stop even its majority Sunni protests, despite the public decision to deploy to Gaza - and mysteriously then stage massive protests when pressure came to deploy following the peace accord - this violence, particularly the total failure to protect foreign embassies, was inexplicable. At any rate, Shia anger would certainly have crept into the conversation as a highly limiting factor. If Riyadh was displeased, the next best thing would have been to stop the war itself. A Crisis Uninterrupted Second, an end to the war is entirely in Pakistan's interest. The country imports 99% of its LNG from Qatar. After the Iranian attack on Ras Laffan, and Oman being hit, too, reports indicate serious disruption in the country.

'A game-changing moment for social media' - what next for big tech after landmark addiction verdict?

A jury in LA has delivered a damning verdict for two of the world's most popular digital platforms, Instagram and YouTube. It ruled those apps are addictive, and deliberately engineered that way – and that its owners have been negligent in their safeguarding of the children who have used them. It's a sombre moment for Silicon Valley and the implications are global. The tech giants in this case, Meta and Google, must now pay $6m (£4.5m) in damages to a young woman known as Kaley, the victim at the centre of this case. She claimed the platforms left her with body dysmorphia, depression and suicidal thoughts. Both companies intend to appeal, with Meta maintaining a single app cannot be solely responsible for a teen mental health crisis. Google, meanwhile, says YouTube is not a social network. But for now the ruling means "the era of impunity is over" according to Dr Mary Franks, a law professor at Washington University. It is hard to overstate what a game-changing moment this court verdict is for social media. Whatever happens next, and there will undoubtedly be appeals and further legal processes, this is going to redefine the landscape. It could even be the beginning of the end of the social media era as we know it. A 'big tobacco' moment? The world's doomscrollers might not have been shocked by the verdict but I think the tech companies were. Meta and Google racked up eye-watering legal fees defending this. This case, and others like it, are clearly of huge significance to them. The other two companies in the trial – TikTok and Snap, the owner of Snapchat – settled before it went to court. There were mutterings in the tech sphere they couldn't afford the fight. I had been invited to slick briefings about all the tools social networks offer (mainly to parents) to protect kids. But ultimately the court ruled their measures were not enough. Arturo Bejar, who used to work at Instagram, said he warned Mark Zuckerberg of the dangers it posed to children several years ago. "It changed from a product you used to a product that uses you," he told BBC Radio 4's Today programme on Thursday. Meta has denied his claims. Some experts have described the verdict as big tech's "big tobacco" moment, and we know how that worked out – although it didn't stop people smoking altogether. Could there be health warnings on screens? Restricted advertising and sponsorship opportunities? The tech companies are currently legally protected in the US by a clause known as Section 230, which shields them from liability for the content that is published on them. Other types of media companies do not have this benefit. It is often said the tech industry couldn't survive without it. But scepticism over the shield may be growing, with Senate Commerce Committee having held a hearing to discuss it on Wednesday. The tech leaders enjoy a generally cosy relationship with US President Donald Trump, who has championed the sector. He hasn't yet leapt to their defence. Another option is that the platforms are forced to strip out all the features designed to keep people there. But engagement is big tech's lifeblood. Lose all the techniques: the endless scrolling, the algorithmic recommendations, the auto play, and you're left with a very different, and arguably limited, social media experience. The success of big platforms lies in their footfall – keeping large numbers of people online for as long as possible and coming back as often as possible, in order that they might be targeted with as many ads as possible. That's how the companies make money. In several territories, including the UK, children do not contribute to this advertising machine but only since regulators intervened. However, today's children are tomorrow's adults and the ideal scenario for the tech companies is that they turn 18 as established users already. Facebook, Meta's original social network, is often jokingly referred to as the "boomer platform" – but 2025 figures suggest nearly half of its worldwide users are aged 18-35. More challenges to come Kaley's court victory is now big tech's second defeat in a number of similar cases set for trial in the US this year. There are more to come. "This landmark verdict, along with many other similar lawsuits against social media companies, signals a shift in how courts view platform design as a set of choices that can carry real legal and social consequences.

New India bill to amend transgender rights sparks protests

India's parliament has passed a controversial bill that seeks to change how transgender people are legally recognised and their right to self-identify, amid protests by opposition parties and the LGBTQ community. The government says the changes will make welfare benefits more accessible and strengthen an existing law against exploitation and trafficking, but critics warn it could exclude many transgender, non-binary and gender-fluid people. India is estimated to have around two million transgender people, though activists say the true number is higher and legal recognition remains uneven. The legislation was approved by both houses this week and now needs the president's assent to become law. In 2014, India's Supreme Court recognised transgender people as a "third gender" and affirmed their right to self-identify. Despite legal protections, many transgender people in India continue to face discrimination and limited access to education, healthcare and formal employment, often relying on traditional or informal forms of work. In 2019, the Transgender Persons (Protection of Rights) Act was enacted, aimed at addressing vulnerabilities faced by the community. Now, the new bill – essentially a proposed amendment to the 2019 law – centres on how a transgender person is defined. The government says the current definition is too vague and makes it difficult to identify those who are most marginalised. It argues that a narrower definition will help ensure welfare benefits – such as job reservations and healthcare support – reach those who need them. It says the changes are intended to protect people facing "extreme and oppressive" discrimination and to prevent exploitation and trafficking. The bill removes the right to self-identify and instead limits recognition to those defined by biological or physical traits. This includes people with intersex variations – where a person is born with sex characteristics that do not fit typical definitions of male or female – as well as traditional identities long used among transgender communities in India. The bill also makes certification from medical boards and district authorities mandatory for those undergoing gender-affirming surgeries. Activists say the new bill moves away from the self-identification principle of the 2014 court ruling and could reshape how transgender people are legally recognised. Critics further argue that the new definition could exclude many transgender people, particularly those who rely on self-identification, including some trans men and women as well as non-binary and gender-fluid people. They also say that mandatory medical certification undermines dignity and autonomy. "It has shattered our identity," transgender rights activist Laxmi Narayan Tripathi told reporters.

OPENAI CLOSES SORA VIDEO-MAKING APP AND CANCELS $1BN DISNEY DEAL

OpenAI has shut down its artificial intelligence (AI) video-generation app Sora less than two years after its unveiling made headlines for creating realistic clips based on simple prompts. At the same time OpenAI will also wind down its $1bn content partnership with entertainment giant Disney, the BBC understands. OpenAI told the BBC on Wednesday that it has discontinued Sora so that it can focus on other developments, such as robotics "that will help people solve real-world, physical tasks". A spokesperson for The Walt Disney Company said "we respect OpenAI's decision to exit the video generation business and to shift its priorities elsewhere". Disney will engage with other AI platforms to find ways to responsibly use the technology without infringing on intellectual property rights, a spokesperson said. OpenAI said it is shutting down both its Sora consumer app and the internet-based platform that professional install to generate videos. The BBC understands that with the closure of Sora, OpenAI will no longer focus on developing video-generation tools. The firm said it aims to create other forms of advanced AI, including "agentic" technology capable of autonomously completing tasks with little human oversight. OpenAI plans to apply the same technology used to teach AI how to produce realistic videos to training robots. Image-making tools on ChatGPT have not been affected by Sora's closure, OpenAI said. What went wrong? Sora was unveiled in 2024 to huge interest around the world due to the high quality of its AI-generated videos. But there were questions around how much money could be made from the tool. Since the platform's launch, Sora made $1.4m in global net in-app revenues, compared to $1.9bn over the same period for ChatGPT, according to data from Seema Shah, VP of insights at market intelligence firm Sensor Tower. Forrester analyst Thomas Husson told BBC News it was "a resource black hole" with "limited monetisation". "The platform struggled to prevent the creation of non-consensual imagery and realistic misinformation, not to mention major copyright infringement," he said. Husson said the decision may have been taken now to "minimise the associated risks" in the run-up to a potential stock launch, which would turn OpenAI into a public company where shares could be bought and sold on an open market. "Given OpenAI is still unprofitable and pressure from investors and rivals is growing, this is cash they likely decided they can't afford to continue burning as initial interest has faded," said Henry Ajder, an expert on AI and deepfakes.

OIL PRICES VOLATILE AS TRUMP TALKS UP IRAN NEGOTIATIONS

Oil prices remained volatile on Wednesday, as the US and Iran clashed over what terms might bring the conflict in the Middle East to an end. Brent crude rose to $101 a barrel at midday in the US before falling back to $98 as President Donald Trump spoke optimistically about the possibility of reaching a deal. But Iranian media on Wednesday cited leaders criticising the US peace proposal. They presented their own terms for a ceasefire, including international recognition of Iran's "sovereign right" to control the Strait of Hormuz, a key route for global oil and gas supplies. On Wednesday, White House press secretary Karoline Leavitt maintained that US attacks were working to convince the Iranian regime to negotiate. She said failure to reach an agreement would be a result of the Iranian regime refusing "to understand they have already been defeated". Distance between the two sides could prolong a conflict that has rocked financial markets and sent energy prices soaring since the US and Israel attacked Iran on 28 February. Iran has effectively blocked the Strait of Hormuz since the start of the war, cutting off a waterway that usually sees about 20% of the world's oil and liquefied natural gas pass through each day. It has generated a supply crisis, forcing countries in Asia – the main destination for oil from the Gulf – to take unusual measures to try to secure oil and gas supplies. Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos declared a state of emergency in his country, which imports 98% of its oil from the Gulf, while on Tuesday, the boss of energy giant Shell said oil shortages could hit Europe next month. Larry Fink, the boss of US financial giant BlackRock, told the BBC that a global recession could be triggered if the price of oil hits $150 a barrel. But hopes that momentum might be building to reach resolution have helped to boost investor spirits and ease oil price pressures. In the US, the main indexes closed higher with the Dow Jones up 0.6% and the Nasdaq 0.7% ahead. The S&P 500 finished marginally higher. In the UK, the FTSE 100 was 1.4% higher after trading ended. Germany's Dax index rose

1.3% and in France, the Cac gained 1.1%. Overnight, major stock exchanges in the Asia Pacific closed higher. Japan's Nikkei 225 ended 2.8% up and South Korea's Kospi index rose 1.5%. Both countries are heavily reliant on oil that passes through the Strait of Hormuz. Australia's ASX 200 index was up by more 1.8%. Hong Kong's Hang Seng and Shanghai's composite each gained by around 1%. In a message posted by its mission to the United Nations on Tuesday, Iran had said it would allow "non-hostile vessels" to pass through the Strait of Hormuz, provided they coordinate with "the competent Iranian authorities". The statement came after some countries appeared to have negotiated safe passage for their vessels despite Tehran threatening to target ships that tried to use the channel. The US on Friday had also lifted sanctions on Iranian oil, in a move it said would help ease the supply crunch.

Proposed IBC amendments risk weakening insolvency framework: Nagarkurnool MP

New Delhi: Nagarkurnool MP Mallu Ravi on Wednesday, March 25, raised serious concerns over the proposed amendments to the Insolvency and Bankruptcy Code (IBC), warning that the Bill in its current form could undermine the foundational principles of India's insolvency resolution framework. Speaking on the amendments, Ravi said the changes dilute the institutional strength of the insolvency resolution process by moving away from the core objective of preserving and maximising asset value for all stakeholders. He expressed particular concern over proposals that would subordinate the role of the liquidator to the Committee of Creditors (CoC). "The earlier framework ensured a fair and balanced approach by empowering the liquidator with quasi-judicial authority. Subordinating this role to the CoC risks undermining neutrality and due process, while concentrating excessive power in the hands of financial creditors," he said. The MP also flagged concerns with the proposed Creditor-Initiated Insolvency Resolution Process (CIIRP), arguing that its continued reliance on payment default as a trigger rather than enabling early intervention allows value erosion to set in before corrective action can begin. He said the mechanism also creates inequity by excluding operational creditors and certain financial creditors from initiating proceedings, narrowing access and reducing transparency. On procedural grounds, Nagarkurnool MP warned that restrictions on the withdrawal of insolvency applications, both before the formation of the CoC and after resolution plans are invited, would discourage early settlements and out-of-court resolutions. "Such rigidity runs counter to the need for flexibility in a complex financial ecosystem," he said. Turning to cross-border insolvency provisions, he cautioned against excessive delegation of legislative powers to the executive, urging Parliament to lay down clear guiding principles rather than transplanting global frameworks such as UNCITRAL without adapting them to Indian realities, including judicial delays and promoter-driven litigation. Ravi also took issue with the amendments' emphasis on strict timelines without adequately addressing systemic constraints such as tribunal backlogs, infrastructure gaps and institutional capacity.

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT GIVES CONDITIONAL APPROVAL TO EU-US TRADE DEAL

The European Parliament has backed legislation to implement an EU-US trade deal, following months of uncertainty over President Donald Trump's tariff threats. A majority of lawmakers voted in favour of the measures on Thursday, but added a series of safeguards to ensure the US honours its side of the deal struck last July. The legislation would set tariffs at 15% for most EU goods – down from the 30% initially threatened – in exchange for European investment in the US and the removal of EU import duties on US industrial goods. The vote comes after months of delay following Trump's threats to annex Greenland and a US Supreme Court ruling that found some of his tariffs unlawful. The EU assembly voted by 417 to 154, and 71 abstentions, in favour of the legislation. The text will need to be signed off by all of the bloc's 27 member states before it is implemented, with a concluding vote expected in April or May. On Thursday, lawmakers moved to strengthen its safeguards, including a provision to suspend the agreement if the US imposes additional tariffs above 15% or introduces new duties on EU goods. Another would halt the deal if the US threatened the EU's territorial sovereignty. MEPs also included a "sunrise clause" that means EU tariff reductions will only take effect if the US upholds its side of the bargain – including lowering tariffs to 15% on EU products that contain less than 50% steel and aluminium. When the framework agreement was announced last summer, Trump said the 50% US tariff on global steel and aluminium would still apply to the EU. But on Thursday the parliament voted that it will only accept zero tariffs on US goods if hundreds of European goods made with steel and aluminium are excluded from that 50% tariff. A "sunset clause" will see the agreement end by 31 March 2028. "At this stage, we have received reassurances from the US that they intend to honour the deal," European economy commissioner Valdis Dombrovskis said after the vote. "While we will continue our efforts to maintain constructive relationships and avoid volatility, we will not turn a blind eye to any risks to our interests." EU trade commissioner Maros Sefcovic described the vote as a "crucial step". The framework agreement was made during a meeting between European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen and Trump at the president's Turnberry golf course in Scotland last July. Von der Leyen hailed it as a "huge deal," while Trump said it was a "good deal for everybody". Trump said at the time that the EU would boost its investment in the US by $600bn (£446bn) – including purchases of American military equipment – and spend $750bn on energy. Von der Leyen said increased purchases of American liquefied natural gas, oil and nuclear fuels would help reduce Europe's reliance on Russian energy. The US and the European Union are each others' largest trading partners. More than 1.6tn ($1.9tn, £1.4tn) in goods and services were exchanged in 2024, according to European figures – nearly a third of all global trade. Trade in goods alone totalled about $976bn in 2024.

Iran has 'legal right' to control Strait of Hormuz, official tells state media, as Israel kills navy chief

Trump says that since 28 February, when the war began, the US has been hitting Iran's military capability "at a level that few people have ever seen before". He says the US has wiped out Iran's navy and air force "completely" and knocked out "close to 90%" of Iran's missile launchers, and "probably more than 90%" of the missiles themselves. Trump continues, saying Iran is begging to make a deal. "They're great negotiators," he says. "Lousy fighters, but great negotiators". While we wait to hear from the US president, Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps-affiliated Tasnim News Agency says Tehran has responded to the US's reported 15-point peace plan and is now awaiting a response. Citing an "informed official", Tasnim reports that Iran's conditions are: "Acts of aggression and assassination by the enemy must cease" "Objective conditions must be established to ensure that war will not recur" "Compensation and war reparations must be guaranteed and clearly determined" "An end to hostilities must be implemented on all fronts and for all resistance groups involved in the conflict across the region", referring to Iran's allies and proxies in the region The official is also reported to have told Tasnim that Iran's exercise of sovereignty over the Strait of Hormuz is the country's "natural and legal right". Polish PM Donald Tusk says his government will cut VAT and excise duty on fuel to shield drivers from rising prices caused by the war in the Middle East. He says VAT on fuel would be cut from 23% to 8% and excise tax would fall to a minimum. His government is also working on introducing a maximum retail fuel price, to be set daily, as well as a bill to introduce a windfall tax on energy companies benefiting from higher sales prices, Tusk says. The price of diesel at the pump has risen by 45% since 25 February to 8.69 zlotys (£1.76) per litre and the price of regular petrol was up 25% during the same period. Tusk says the government does not plan to impose any restrictions on fuel sales because stocks remain sufficient. The cabinet, he goes on, will hold an extraordinary meeting later to take decisions on lowering fuel prices. Here in Germany, lawmakers have approved initial measures aimed at curbing surging fuel costs as the Iran war pushes up prices. It means petrol stations, for a time, will only be able to increase prices once a day, at noon. The government says it will review the measures after six months. The bill, which still needs to pass the upper house, will also make it easier for Germany's competition regulator to combat excessive pricing. It's disputed whether the plans will really lead to lower prices at the pump, while there have also been industry warnings about rushing through major changes in competition law. A little earlier, we heard from Nato's chief Mark Rutte who was presenting his 2025 annual report at a news conference in Brussels. Asked if the war in Iran is now a Nato issue, Rutte says the Nato alliance has "long recognised the threat Iran's missile programme poses to allies and their interests". He says that what the US is doing is "degrading those capabilities, both the nuclear and the missiles". Iran now has "capabilities increasingly dangerous for allies", Rutte says, adding that Nato defence systems have successfully intercepted ballistic missiles heading towards Turkey from Iran on three separate occasions. His comments come after US President Donald Trump continued to criticise Nato countries and their response to the Iran war. Iran is still under a government-imposed internet outage, but some residents are paying hefty prices to connect to the internet. I've been speaking to some of them, and asking what they plan to do after the war ends. Some of them replied to my question with a question, saying that their answer depends on whether the Islamic Republic stays in power. "Will the Islamic Republic still be in power in this scenario? If yes, I'll start using all my options to get out of Iran. If no, I'll wait and see what happens. I've got some ideas to maybe start a business," a Tehran-based man in his 30s says. A woman in her 20s, also in Tehran, says: "The answer really depends on whether the Islamic Republic stays in power or not. If they go, I'll go on a trip as a reward to myself. If they stay in power, I'll try my best to get out of the country." Others tell me they're missing the small things. "I really want the war to end. I'll go to my favourite library. It's closed because of the war. I don't like studying at home," another woman in Tehran says. "I'll stay out until midnight and sit in a cafe. It might seem very basic, but I miss it. I miss going out at night in Tehran," a final woman in her 20s, in the Iranian capital, says.

'We are in agony' - Savannah Guthrie does first interview since mum's disappearance

US television presenter Savannah Guthrie has spoken of her family's "agony" in the first interview since her mother's disappearance. Nancy Guthrie, 84, has been missing since 1 February, when she was last seen at her Tucson, Arizona home. Police released images of a masked person captured by a security camera, but investigative leads received so far have fallen through. "To think of what she went through, I wake up every night in the middle of the night, every night," Guthrie said in an excerpt of the interview released by the TODAY show. The Guthrie family is offering a $1 million reward, in addition to $100,000 pledged by the FBI, for information leading to Nancy's Guthrie's return. "Someone needs to do the right thing," Savannah Guthrie told her former TODAY show co-host Hoda Kotb in the emotional interview. "We are in agony. It is unbearable." Her family is one of 33 awaiting word from loved ones reported missing in Arizona in the past year to the US justice department's missing-persons database. Six of those went missing from Pima County, including Nancy Guthrie.

Trump confirms May meeting with Xi Jinping as Iran war forces postponement

US president Donald Trump says he will meet Chinese president Xi Jinping in China on 14-15 May, after delaying the landmark trip amid the US-Israel war with Iran. This would be the first visit to China by a US president in nearly 10 years. Trump is also set to host Xi in Washington DC later this year, and officials are "finalizing preparations for these Historic Visits", he wrote on Truth Social on Wednesday. White House press secretary Karoline Leavitt confirmed the dates of Trump's visit, telling reporters that President Xi had understood and accepted the request to postpone the trip. "President Xi understood that it's very important for the president to be here throughout these combat operations right now," Leavitt said at a press briefing on Wednesday. Beijing has not confirmed the dates listed by Trump - though it does not typically reveal Xi's schedule so far in advance. Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Lin Jian told reporters on Thursday that "both sides are maintaining communication regarding President Trump's visit to China". He also said that "leader-level diplomacy plays an irreplaceable strategic guiding role" in bilateral ties. Trump's trip, originally slated for 31 March, was delayed after the US and Israel launched wide-ranging strikes on Iran last month, killing the country's supreme leader. In response, Iran attacked Israel and US-allied states in the Gulf and effectively closed the Strait of Hormuz - a key waterway for the world's oil and liquefied natural gas - leading to a global fuel crisis. Trump has urged US allies to help unblock the strait. He also threatened Iran with attacks on its energy production infrastructure if it did not allow full access through the waterway. When asked if the Iran war would wind down by the time Trump visits China, Leavitt said they had "always estimated approximately four to six weeks, so you can do the math on that". The last time a US president visited China was in November 2017, during Trump's first term. The last time Trump and Xi met was last October in South Korea, on the sidelines of the Apec summit.

AUSTRALIA'S SUNSCREEN REGULATOR WANTS NEW RULES AFTER RECENT PRODUCT SCANDAL

Australia's sunscreen regulator has proposed sweeping reforms to the industry after a recent scandal saw dozens of popular brands pulled off shelves. An experiment by a trusted consumer advocacy group last year found many Australian sunscreens were not providing the protection they claimed to, sparking public outrage in a country which is a skin cancer hotspot. An investigation by the Australian Broadcasting Corporation also alleged issues with a leading laboratory which test sunscreen efficacy and a manufacturer which made a common base formula. The Therapeutic Goods Administration (TGA) has now announced plans to make sunscreen labelling simpler and introduce more oversight at testing labs.

'I HAVE NO RECOLLECTION OF ANYTHING' - EPSTEIN SURVIVOR SAYS SHE WAS DRUGGED AND RAPED

A woman who said she was drugged and raped by convicted sex offender Jeffrey Epstein has spoken publicly for the first time to BBC Newsnight about her ordeal. The woman, who spoke on condition of anonymity and whom the BBC will refer to as Nicky, said she met the disgraced financier when she was 19, working as a model. She said that after she gave him a massage at his waterfront mansion in Palm Beach, Florida, he gave her a drink of water, and she blacked out for hours, when she believes she was raped by Epstein. Nicky said she felt encouraged to come forward by other survivors sharing their stories. She is now calling for the US Department of Justice to release all its remaining files on Epstein. "There's nothing you won't do to stop reliving all of it' In an extensive interview with BBC Newsnight, Nicky described in detail Epstein's abuses. As other survivors of Epstein have recounted, Nicky's interaction with Epstein began with a massage. He asked her to remove her top and bra. "I honestly thought, OK, maybe it's just an old rich guy that has a fetish and so be it," she said. "Whatever. I mean, it paid my rent." But a few weeks later, when Nicky returned to see Epstein, her encounter was different. "So I took my top off just like last time, started at his feet, worked my way up, and when I got to his upper thigh and went on to his chest, he pulled at my jeans, like almost to unbutton them," Nicky said. She told Epstein she was on her period, which was not true. He encouraged her to have sex with him anyway and proceeded to masturbate in front of her, Nicky recalled. She quickly got dressed and told herself she had to "get the hell out of here". She went to the bathroom to wash the massage oil off her hands and when she returned, Epstein offered her a sip of water. "I took some water and I have no recollection of anything for a minimum of 12 hours after that," Nicky said. She said she woke up feeling sick, sluggish and heavy. Nicky said when she went to the bathroom, there were signs she had had sex, although she could not recall any intercourse. "I have done various psychotherapies to try to remember, to try and have a glimpse of something, and it's black, I have no idea," she said of the interaction.

ARMY COMMANDER CONVICTED OF GUINEA STADIUM MASSACRE DIES IN PRISON

One of the key military figures convicted of crimes against humanity for his involvement in Guinea's 2009 stadium massacre has died in custody, authorities say. Aboubacar Sidiki Diakité - also known as Toumba - died early on Wednesday in hospital following a medical emergency, the prison administration said. He was serving a 10-year sentence for his role in one of the darkest episodes in Guinea's history in which more than 150 people were killed in the capital, Conakry, as they demanded an end to military rule. At least 109 women were also raped. While in custody, Diakité remained a controversial figure, creating a political party and attempting to run for president. Last year, he declared his intention to stand in the presidential elections, which was rejected by the Supreme Court after it ruled he was ineligible. At the time of the massacre, Diakité was commander of the presidential guard and a close ally of Guinea's then military ruler, Moussa Dadis Camara. According to the prison administration, Diakité was declared dead at the Samory Touré Military Hospital in Conakry, where he was taken late on Monday. Citing his medical report, the administration said he presented symptoms characterised by gastric swelling, abdominal pain and constipation. His death has prompted mixed reactions in Guinea where memories of the 2009 violence remain politically sensitive, with people still waiting for justice. One political expert likened his death to "the end of an era", telling the BBC: "He died, but the full truth died with him." Tens of thousands of people had gathered at a stadium on 28 September 2009 to protest against the possibility of Camara running for president.

'We are being choked': Philippines transport workers strike over fuel costs

Hundreds of transport workers in the Philippines' capital Manila have gone on strike over rising fuel costs. Diesel and petrol prices have more than doubled since the Iran war broke out on 28 February - with the Philippines now in a state of national energy emergency. One 62-year-old driver in Manila told the BBC the situation was getting increasingly desperate, saying he had no food to support his five children and had not received any cash aid from the government. As the two-day strike started on Thursday a ship carrying more than 700,000 barrels of Russian crude oil arrived in the country. President Ferdinand Marcos' spokeswoman said. Press Secretary Claire Castro told reporters that the Sierra Leone-flagged Sara Sky arrived earlier this week with the crude shipment. Marcos had promised to look for new sources of oil as the country had been relying on supplies that pass through the Strait of Hormuz for 98% of its requirements. The transport coalitions leading the strike have laid out sweeping demands - from scrapping fuel taxes and rolling back oil prices, to abandoning deregulation and introducing state controls. They are also pushing for fare increases and higher wages. Groups of protesters gathered in different areas across the capital on Thursday morning, holding signs and calling for the government to do more to help. Many of them were drivers of jeeps - mini-buses known for their cheap fares. Motorcycle and car ride-hailing drivers were also among those who earlier said they would join protests, according to local reports. Some said they had not received the payout of 5,000 pesos ($83; £62) that the Department of Social Welfare and Development had said certain drivers would be eligible for. "I lined up for more than five hours yesterday for the cash aid from the government, but my name was not there," said 62-year-old Guillermo Japole, adding that he had received "no cash aid, no earnings, no food for the family". Guillermo, whose five children are in school, says his family is on the edge of being evicted from their rental home.

Zimbabwe says 15 nationals killed after being lured to fight for Russia

A right-wing populist party made big poll gains - and it's shaking up Australian politics

Thirty years ago, against the odds, a fish-and-chip shop owner with little political experience won a seat in the Australian parliament. Since then Pauline Hanson has become as well known for her inflammatory anti-immigration rhetoric as much as her parliamentary stunts, while support for her right-wing populist One Nation party has ebbed and flowed. But after returning from the political wilderness a decade ago, Hanson's party is now riding a new wave of popularity, driven by voters weary of mainstream political parties that they say don't understand their struggles. On 21 March, One Nation achieved its first electoral breakthrough outside Hanson's home state of Queensland. In a state election in South Australia, the party won the second highest number of votes - more than 20% - the first time it has done so in Australia where two parties have traditionally been dominant. Incumbent Labor Premier Peter Malinauskas won a resounding victory in the poll, increasing his majority in the process.

RCB's Name To Be Changed After Rs 16,700 Crore Sale? Ananya Birla Might Just Have Answered The Question

Will Royal Challengers Bengaluru change its name after being acquired by a new group? That is one question on everyone's mind since a consortium led by the Aditya Birla Group (ABG) on Tuesday acquired 100 percent equity stake in the IPL franchise Royal Challengers Bengaluru for a whopping USD 1.78 billion (approximately Rs 16,706 crore) from its current owner, United Spirits Limited. Other parties involved in the group are Blackstone's perpetual private equity strategy, BXPE (a firm of which Viral Patel is the CEO), Bolt Ventures owned by American investor David Blitzer, and media conglomerate Times of India. RCB are one of the eight original IPL franchises that have been part of the league since its inception in 2008. They won the IPL title for the first time in 2025. However, if a post by Ananya Birla, a prominent face in the Aditya Birla Group, is anything to go by,

RCB's name will not be changed. Ananya reposted an Instagram post on her story which said the team's name will not be changed. Talking about the mega RCB sale, which made the team the costliest IPL side ever, the USL said in a statement: "United Spirits Limited, pursuant to the meeting of its Board of Directors, today announced that it has entered into definitive agreements for the sale of the 100 percent equity stake held in its wholly owned subsidiary Royal Challengers Sports Private Limited (RCSPL) to a consortium. "The consortium comprises Aditya Birla Group (ABG), The Times of India Group (Times), Bolt Ventures (Bolt), and Blackstone's perpetual private equity strategy, BXPE (Blackstone), for a total consideration of INR 166.6 bn in an all-cash transaction," the statement added. The transaction includes RCB's men's and women's (WPL) teams. "RCSPL owns and operates the Royal Challengers Bengaluru (RCB) franchises that participate in the Indian Premier League

(IPL) and Women's Premier League (WPL). "Upon completion of this transaction, the consortium will, through its ownership of RCSPL, acquire the rights to own and operate the IPL and WPL franchise," said the USL. The announcement also concluded the strategic review of RCSPL that was initiated by USL on November 5, 2025.

TENSION BETWEEN TESTS AND FRANCHISE T20 - CUMMINS

Australia Test captain Pat Cummins says there is a growing tension between Test and franchise T20 cricket after several team-mates opted out of The Hundred auction because of a home series against Bangladesh in August. The Hundred organisers hoped to attract major names to its inaugural auction, but none of Australia's Test regulars entered the selection process. Some Australia white-ball players picked up Hundred deals, with Tim David, Mitchell Marsh and Adam Zampa set to play in this summer's tournament. "Some of our guys are saying no to a half a million pounds for 20 days' work to go and play those two Test matches against Bangladesh," Cummins told the Business of Sport podcast, external "It's at a tension point. It has been for a while, but I think it's only growing. "Something we speak about is how do we make sure we've got our best Australian guys to choose from when we're picking a Test side or an ODI side, because there is so much demand for them elsewhere."

Fast bowler Cummins is captain of Sunrisers Hyderabad in the Indian Premier League (IPL), and the owners of his franchise bought into Hundred side Northern Superchargers, renaming them Sunrisers Leeds. Cummins' wife Becky is from Harrogate, and he said he would be interested in playing for the franchise. "We spend a lot of time over in England during the summer," said Cummins. "All the boys that go and play it love it. Slightly different format; I think it's less than a month long. It looks good fun, so one day I'd like to play." Cummins is set to miss the start of the IPL, which begins on Saturday, as he recovers from the back injury that ruled him out of all but one Test in their Ashes series win over England. The Bangladesh series - Australia's first Test assignment since the Ashes ended in January - runs from 13 to 26 August, while this year's Hundred takes place from 21 July to 16 August. The Tests will be the first between the sides since 2017, while Bangladesh have not toured Australia since their first visit in 2003.

"Imran Khan In A Cell Built For Death Row Inmates": Pakistan Great's Son Makes Explosive Appeal At UN

Kasim Khan, the son of former Pakistan Prime Minister and legendary cricket captain Imran Khan, has made a statement at the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC), urging for the release of his father from prison. Imran Khan has been in jail since 2023 and was sentenced last year, along with his wife, to 17 years on corruption charges they both deny. Kasim alleged that Imran has been held in a solitary confinement cell, one which is "built for death row inmates". Kasim's statement comes after it was reported in recent weeks that Imran had lost a large part of his vision in his right eye during his imprisonment. "I'm deeply concerned by the alarming rise of intolerance in persecution in Pakistan. We are witnessing a systematic campaign to dehumanize and silence specific segments of the population," Kasim said in his speech at the UNHRC. "My father, Imran Khan, has been in prison for nearly 1,000 days. He is the primary target of a regime that treats dissent not as a political disagreement, but as a grave crime to be crushed. I've not seen my father in over three years. He is held in a solitary confinement cell - a cell built for death row inmates. "UN experts have warned the inhumane conditions could amount to torture. This is not neglect - it's a deliberate persecution designed to strip a human being off his dignity. The intolerance extends beyond him," Kasim added. "Pakistan has expanded its blasphemy laws to impose life imprisonment, and branded citizens as terrorists, fostering a climate of hatred. We ask this council and the OHCHR to urge Pakistan to end this persecution immediately. They must comply with UN Working Groups' opinion, and they must release my father and all political prisoners. Thank you," he concluded. In February, following reports of Imran's condition in prison, a 14-member group comprising Imran's former teammates and opponents, including Indian cricket legends Sunil Gavaskar and Kapil Dev, had made a formal appeal to the Pakistan government for "fair and humane treatment" of Imran.

Lalit Modi Controversially Calls Sanjiv Goenka 'Clown'. It's Related To RCB, RR's Record Sales

Lalit Modi, Indian Premier League (IPL)'s first chairman, launched a brutal attack on Lucknow Super Giants owner Sanjiv Goenka over his social media post on the record-breaking sales of Rajasthan Royals and Royal Challengers Bengaluru. While a Kal Somani-led consortium for USD bought RR for 1.63 billion dollars, RCB became the most expensive franchise in IPL history after being acquired by a consortium comprising Aditya Birla Group, Blackstone, Times of India Group and Bolt Ventures for 1.78 billion dollars. Goenka downplayed Lalit Modi's role in IPL's growing valuation over the years and credited the league's structure, particularly its media rights model. Modi did not mince his words while reacting to Goenka's social media post and even called him a 'clown' and added that he 'has a memory loss'. "Seriously this guy really has a memory loss of who conceived the model. That's ok. He just lives in his own world. We all know that @DrSanjivGoenka is a (clown emoji) wish it was his brother @hvgoenka who owned the ipl franchise. He is a true cricket fan. Not this clown - who thinks his tweet will change history. Just proves he has zero knowledge. Just swelled up head Jai hind. @PLI Lalit Modi posted on X (formerly Twitter). Earlier, Goenka reacted to the record sales of the franchises with special mention of the league's governance. "@rajasthanroyals, acquired for roughly ?270 crore in 2008, have just been sold for over ?15,000 crore. @RCBTweets, acquired for roughly ?485 crore, sold for over ?16,600 crore. Two franchises, same week, each over ?15,000 crore," Goenka wrote on X. "That value was built by the architecture of the IPL. The way broadcast and digital rights were structured. The governance that gave brands confidence to invest at premium levels. Much of this traces back to the vision of @JayShah," he added. Lalit Modi left India in 2010 in a haze of allegations related to tax evasion, money-laundering and proxy ownership linked to the money-minting IPL.

VIRAT KOHLI GETS A NEW FULL SLEEVE TATTOO AHEAD OF IPL 2026

India and Royal Challengers Bengaluru star batter Virat Kohli got a new full sleeve tattoo on his left hand ahead of the Indian Premier League 2026. He got the work done at 'Aliens Tattoo India', which shared the video of it on Instagram and it went viral on no time. As per the company, the tattoo signifies Kohli's journey. The player will be seen in action during the 19th edition of IPL that begins on March 28. RCB take on SunRisers Hyderabad in the first game at M Chinnaswamy Stadium, Bengaluru. "This was not about adding another tattoo. It was about creating something that carries depth, something that reflects who he has become," wrote Aliens Tattoo in its website. "This piece draws from his journey as a person. It reflects the transformation he has gone through, what he has moved beyond, what he has arrived at, and the direction he continues to move in. At every inflection point in his life, he has shed parts of who he once was, through discipline, through focus, through an unwavering sense of belief. And yet, not everything was left behind. Some parts stayed. Some became stronger. And much more was added - to his personality, to his beliefs, to the way he approaches life today. His new full sleeve tattoo reflects exactly that. "His left arm was not a blank canvas. It already carried years of ink, an incomplete arm-band, older tattoos, elements that belonged to different phases of his life.

NORTHAMPTON COACH VESTY QUESTIONS ENGLAND'S IDENTITY

Northampton head coach Sam Vesty has questioned whether England have lost their identity under Steve Borthwick. The RFU are currently holding a review into the team's under-performance in the Six Nations in which England lost four games for the first time in the championship since 1976. Under scrutiny will be not only England's results but the style of play which has been criticised as being overly kick-heavy and conservative. Borthwick, who has spoken of his desire to develop England's game from the basic approach which took England to the World Cup semi-final in 2023, has referred to the weight of the jersey proving restrictive. However Vesty, who coaches England half backs Alex Mitchell and Fin Smith as well as Tommy Freeman, Henry Pollock, Alex Coles and Fraser Dingwall at Northampton, thinks this is a red herring. "It is the same with all of the other countries as well. They all have a weight of expectation," Vesty told BBC Radio Northampton's The Saints Show. "Scotland move the ball. Italy move the ball... all those teams that we have just mentioned - if I asked you what their identity was, you could pretty clearly say something, couldn't you? I'm not sure you can say that with England at the moment." England delivered a much-improved display in a narrow 48-46 defeat to France in the final round with plenty of attacking rugby but Vesty queried how much importance should be attached to the game. "It's the easiest time in the world to play, isn't it?" added Vesty, who was an assistant coach on England's 2017 tour to Argentina under Eddie Jones. "Everyone's written them off. There's no pressure on them. Can't win. And we see a free rugby team.

'TREATMENT OF SCOTLAND PLAYERS WASN'T GOOD ENOUGH'

Captain Rachel Malcolm says it was a "hard read" when BBC Sport laid out the struggles of some of her Scotland players at last year's Women's Rugby World Cup. The 34-year-old said she wants the squad to be "happy and supported". In February, some Scotland players told BBC Sport of an emotionally damaging World Cup tournament because Scottish Rugby's handling of player contracts left them with poor mental health. Scotland reached the last eight, the women's team's best performance at a World Cup in 23 years. But off the field some players were struggling with uncertainty over their professional futures, and one said she suffered a breakdown as a result. "I think it ultimately wasn't good enough in terms of how the players were treated and team-mates were feeling," said Malcolm at the launch of the 2026 Women's Six Nations. "As a player group we were very together in that whole process and we were very aware of different people's situations and different people's responses to what happened. "I think it's obviously brave of those girls to speak out but I think the most important thing is that moving forward change needs to happen for that process to be better - and that is what has happened. "The Scottish Rugby Union is now working with us and making sure those processes are better so the same doesn't happen and people aren't made to feel that way in the future." Scotland's player contracts had been due for renewal in June last year, two months before the World Cup, and they had asked for 12-month deals to ensure job security and allow them to focus on the tournament. While some were offered that deal, a quarter were told their deals would end in October, immediately after the tournament. Four players spoke to BBC Sport on the condition of anonymity and described the news as a "big shock" that put them under huge mental strain. At the time annual contracts ranged from £18,000 to £27,000 and in most cases were a player's main source of income.

Barefoot In Abidjan, Fearless In Germany: The Rise Of RB Leipzig's Yan Diomande

One of the biggest stars in the German Bundesliga, Yan Diomande, is a name that instills fear in the minds of teams across the globe. The man whose speed and dribbling ability take him past some of the finest defenders in the world once had to fight for the absolute basics. His journey from the dusty streets of Abidjan in Ivory Coast to the clinical brilliance of Germany's top flight wasn't a straight line, but a battle fought through sheer defiance. In a video feature released by RB Leipzig, the 19-year-old winger took a deep dive into his raw self, revealing a story defined not just by goals, but by an unwavering sense of responsibility. Diomande's story began in the Sicogi neighbourhood of Abidjan, Ivory Coast. Like many of the world's greatest talents, his first pitch was the street, and his first boots were nonexistent. Playing barefoot wasn't a choice but the harsh reality of the circumstances back home. In those early years, football wasn't merely a hobby or a path to fame, it was, as Diomande put it himself, a mechanism for survival. What he and his friends learned by playing on the sun-baked streets of Sicogi was a lesson in resilience that even the finest academies in the world could not have taught. Looking back at a picture of himself and his friends, playing football in the streets of Abidjan, Diomande highlighted how so many of his friends have now broken into European football. While he is playing in Germany, a number of others are in England or Belgium. Despite his move to Germany, Diomande stays in touch with his old friends through a WhatsApp group, sharing the same bond that they once did back home. From Ivory Coast to the USA Diomande moved to the DME Academy in Florida (USA) in 2022. It was a period of rapid maturation where he traded the spontaneity of street football for the structured discipline of the American league system. "It's not easy to go so far away from your family. Now I feel like I could live on my own forever," he said of his experience in the USA. This chapter proved crucial, providing him with the mental fortitude required to navigate a life far from home. From not knowing the English language to battling loneliness, the USA stint laid the foundation and battle-hardened Diomande for challenges that had started to unfold in his top-tier football career.
